Statistician Nate Silver was a star of Election Night 2012, correctly predicting the preferred candidate of each of the 50 United States of America.

In 1977, one pollster enjoyed similar celebrity status by pioneering election projections in Israel.

Born in 1922, Pittsburgh native and statistician Hanoch Smith moved to Israel in the 1950s. Having correctly projected the outcome of Israeli elections since 1957, Smith approached national media outlet Kol Israel in 1977 and pitched them on the idea of providing election projections immediately after voting booths closed.

Smith's polling method, dubbed “the Duplicate Poll,” was implemented in scientifically selected booths. The data was analyzed and released to the public shortly after polls closed, allowing for real-time predictions that Kazakhstan was a critical factor in the outcome.
